Responding to the Pope’s Challenge

Pope Francis arrived for his first visit to the United States to great fanfare and anticipation. Given the pope’s humble Franciscan roots and his willingness to speak so forcefully about social justice issues, all of us at IWJ wondered how Francis would craft his message, particularly in his speech to a joint-session of Congress.

Perhaps the only people disappointed in the pope’s visit were those who hoped that Francis would temper his message given the pervasive economic inequality that exists in the United States today. Whether he was speaking to elected lawmakers in Washington, DC, worshippers in New York City, or activists in Philadelphia, Francis never wavered from his message of ending the “throwaway” economy, valuing labor and workers, and giving anyone who puts in an honest day’s work the ability to sustain a family.

The pope’s message presents America with a challenge. It transcends partisan agendas and appeals to the values that we all share as a nation. The value of family. The value of hard work. The value of love for our neighbors.

As Pope Francis has noted, “the word ‘solidarity’ maintains its prophetic force today, even though some people may have thought the term had seen its day.”

In the coming months, we will keep Francis’s words and spirit in mind as we refocus and deepen our fight to end wage theft, to win a national living wage and paid leave policy, and to strengthen and enforce workplace safety regulations.

Living out Francis’ Message

On November 10 we joined tens of thousands of working people at city halls across the country to declare ourselves “15 voters” and commit to voting and volunteering for the presidential candidates who lead the way on establishing a national living wage.

In the third week of November, IWJ affiliates from coast to coast participated in our annual Wage Theft Day of Action to celebrate successful campaigns to pass laws against wage theft and recover wages, expose businesses that regularly engage in wage theft, and launch a brand new website full of resources to help end wage theft in America once and for all.

And as the holiday season gets into full swing, the IWJ network will make sure that Black Friday shoppers are aware of the low wages, lack of set schedule and paid leave policy, and to strengthen and enforce workplace safety regulations.

IWJ Receives Bradford O’Neil Award for Social Justice

IWJ Executive Director Rudy López accepted the award from Dominican University on behalf of IWJ. Following are excerpts from his speech:

I accept this award on behalf of our network as a whole and the tremendous work they have done over the past 19 years and as a down payment for the work to come. There is so much yet to do and our network of faith and labor groups and worker centers look forward to working with those who share our common values.

For those of us who are people of faith those values and ideals are rooted in our faith. It is through our life experience we find ways to give shape and life to it in the real world.

Thank you again for this honor and may God bless you all.

The Blessing of Faithful Givers

Following are excerpts from a Q&A with Ian Robinson, a long-time member of the Faithful Givers Club, IWJ’s monthly sustainer program.

Tell us about your work in the social justice movement and anything else about yourself.

About 10 years ago I became active in social justice, organizing non-tenure track faculty at the University of Michigan. I became a union officer with the Huron Valley Central Labor Council (AFL-CIO) at the state level. Eventually, they asked if I would run for president of that body, and after a little thinking I decided it would be an excellent endeavor. The Central Labor Councils are really interesting because they create room for non-union labor council members to organize, and also promote organizing on a local level, which is really critical to building worker power in our community.

Why is IWJ’s work important to you?

Around 2006, while still in the thick of leading the faculty union, I began working with a class on labor in North America. I studied the causes behind the great migration out of Mexico and what happened to people after they arrived in the United States. As part of the course, we used to go Nogales, Arizona and meet with individuals trying to immigrate to the United States, as well as with activists on both sides of the border. At one point I had a particularly talented group that determined after the visit that we needed to build a worker center. As I looked around for development support, I found IWJ. With the help of both IWJ and National Domestic Workers Alliance, we were able to establish a worker center. IWJ is important to me because of that support. After building the worker center, I became even more aware of IWJ’s work and leadership, as well as the need for organizations to help represent workers in parts of the economy where unions are not present (especially in the immigration and low-wage sectors). IWJ has been instrumental in many other aspects of social justice and continues to impress me with the breadth and depth of their work.

Reclaiming Stolen Wages

In August, the IWJ network met in Chicago for a three day convening on wage theft. During a story-circle on the last day of the meeting, twenty participants took turns sharing any experience they might have had with wage theft. The results were shocking. Every single person in the room, regardless of age, occupation, or ethnicity had been a victim of wage theft at some point in their working lives.

This point underscores the disturbing truth that wage theft is deeply-rooted in our economy that many workers don’t even realize that they have been victimized or that there are steps that they can take to fight back.

In Brooklyn, Worker Justice Project organized a demonstration outside of the apartment of Samuel Just, owner of a cleaning service, who was arrested after former employees, some of whom had worked more than 24 hours without rest, filed a complaint about not being paid for their work. Despite the arrest, Just only agreed to pay after days of protesting in his neighborhood.

In Michigan, The Michac Center spent four months campaigning for a week of wages for a worker who had been victimized by a notorious local contractor. The campaign was finally able to secure payment to the worker and provide an important example of how to fight back for other workers who had not been paid by the contractor.

In Nashville, Workers Dignity concluded a successful year-long campaign to force Marriott Hotels to pay its hospitality workers wages they were owed for cleaning rooms, forcing the billion dollar corporation to pay up.

And just in the past few weeks in California and New York, Governors Brown and Cuomo have signed legislation to combat wage theft and other forms of worker injustice.

Our Vote; Our Values

The Interfaith Worker Justice family is proud to be in solidarity with workers who have been fighting for $15/hour and a union for more than two years now! Around the country, IWJ affiliates have listened to the stories of workers earning tragically low wages, walked out on strike with retail workers, offered prayers and even fasted with fast food workers who are exercising their rights and organizing for respect and dignity at their jobs. IWJ leaders and activists around the country are often among the few who stay, after the big, glamorous actions are over, to escort workers back to work after they’ve taken a very brave stand.

The actions taken across the country on November 10 symbolized a renewal of our commitment to stay alongside workers in the Fight for $15. As we head into this 2016 election season, we’re not only demanding $15 and a union for fast food workers, we’re also letting candidates know that many of us are $15 voters. For those of us who vote, we’re looking for candidates who support policies that touch many aspects of workers lives: we can only take candidates seriously who also support $15 and a union for fast food workers, childcare providers, and home care providers. We can only entertain candidates who understand that Black Lives Matter and that there is a dire need for reform in our immigration system.

We vote our values. We vote for $15 an hour and a union.

IWJ affiliate Centro de Trabajadores Unidos en lucha turned out big and strong to Fight for $15 on Nov. 10.
